Software Artifacts

SORASCS: An architectural framework and integration platform, based on service-oriented architectures, for socio-cognitive systems modeling and analysis.

RADAR: A system supporting cognitive assistance for complex tasks.

Aura: A system supporting mobile users in pervasive computing environments.

DiscoTect: A tool for “discovering” software architectures by dynamically monitoring a running system.

Rainbow: Infrastructure to support self-healing systems, including run-time support for monitoring a system at the architectural level, detecting problem and opportunities for adaptation, and effecting system repairs.

AcmeStudio: An architect’s workbench, supporting the development and analysis of software architectures. Allows one to define architectural styles by specializing a common generic infrastructure.

Acme: An architectural interchange language. Supports efficient interchange of architectural descriptions between different tools. Allows researchers in software architecture community to exchange designs, exploit others' tools, develop new architectural description languages. Developed with David Wile at ISI (CMU, 1995-present). Also developed Acme-to-UML-RT translators.

Wright: A specification language for software architecture. The language supports description of connectors as explicit semantic entities, provides formal rules for checking of completeness and consistency, and a tool suite (based on commercial model checking technology) that automates these checks. (CMU, 1993-present).

Aesop: A generator for software architecture design environments. The system allows an environment implementor to provide an architectural style description. It then produces an open, integrated environment to support construction of systems in that architectural style. (CMU, 1992-present)

ASCENT: A tool for specializing programming environments to support application frameworks. Allows an environment designer to transform the grammar of a programming language into one specialized for a particular application domain. The output of the tool is a programming environment for the specialized language, together with a semi-automatically generated transformer for converting programs in that environment into those of the original environment. (CMU, 1992)

Broadcast-Ada: An augmented version of Ada that supports selective broadcast. The user of this language can declare events, register procedures with events, and announce events. Uses a preprocessor translate programs to Ada for execution. (CMU, 1992)

The Forest Software Development Environment: A tool integration framework that supports implicit tool invocation through selective broadcast, controlled by dynamically configurable policies of tool interaction (Tektronix/CMU, 1989-90).

The Z Engineering Environment (ZEE): An environment for constructing formal specifications in the Z specification language. With Norman Delisle and Mayer Schwartz (Tektronix, 1988).

TransformGen: An environment for transforming formal descriptions of programming environments. Now a major component of the Gandalf System of tools for environment generation, distributed widely to universities and industry. With Barbara Staudme t Lerner, Charles Krueger, and Robert Stockton (CMU, 1987).

Gnome: A programming environment generator which has been used to build novice programming environments for the Karel, Pascal, Fortran programming languages. These environments are now being marketed commercially. All three have been used for 9 years in the introductory programming classes at Carnegie Mellon University and other major universities. With R. Chandhok, M. Tucker, D. Goldenson, and P. Miller (CMU, 1987).

The CMU Calendar Board System: An interactive distributed calendar management system, used at CMU by over 500 people to coordinate the department's activities (CMU, 1986).

DemoGen: A system to generate CAI-like demonstrations of research prototypes (CMU, 1983).
